My experience of being at Facebook was how human it is, everyone involved has good intentions, makes choices, makes mistakes, and I lived how open everyone is about learning from them, specially when those mistakes took away from the intention of serving community.

I understand that today for many people there is anger when our expectations are betrayed, or we have fears and feel powerless about the role technology plays in our life. Part of the way forward I think is through believing that people who work on these services are that, people, with an intention to be of service to the world, and that we can engage with them from that place, as we would like to be engaged with. The other part of the way forward is to observe the role technology plays in our own lives, and for us to take steps to have it be in service of our lives and our communities. I am getting both these things wrong all the time and trying to learn from them.

Thank you Mark and everyone there for what you bring into the world, as everything it is a work in progress that does and can do so much more good for people in the world.

Today is Facebook's 14th birthday.

It's a moment to reflect on how far we've come from that dorm room at Harvard and how far we still have to go to bring the world closer together. And it's a moment to think about what we need to do better.

Sometimes people ask what I've learned along the way. I was 19 when I started Facebook, and I didn't know anything about building a company or global internet service. Over the years I've made almost every mistake you can imagine. I've made dozens of technical errors and bad deals. I've trusted the wrong people and I've put talented people in the wrong roles. I've missed important trends and I've been slow to others. I've launched product after product that failed.

The reason our community exists today is not because we avoided mistakes. It's because we believe what we're doing matters enough to keep trying to solve our greatest challenges -- knowing full well that we'll fail again and again, but that it's the only way to make progress.

We are still early in this journey and we will keep working to improve. That focus has always been our strength, and that's what this year is all about.

Bringing us closer together with our family and friends matters, and 14 years in I'm proud of what we do and grateful to be a part of something so meaningful.

It's an honor to be on this journey with you.
