SAN FRANCISCO — Over the past few weeks, top Facebook executives assembled virtually for a series of emergency meetings.

In one gathering last weekend, half a dozen managers — including Adam Mosseri, head of Instagram, and Nick Clegg, Facebook's vice president of global affairs — discussed pausing the development of an Instagram service for children ages 13 and under, said two people briefed on the meeting. Mark Zuckerberg, Facebook's chief executive, weighed in to approve the decision, the people said.

The articles were based on a trove of Facebook documents, which were leaked by an unidentified whistle-blower.

... As scrutiny mounted, Facebook delayed the Instagram service for children. On Thursday, Antigone Davis, Facebook's global head of safety, was questioned for more than two hours by lawmakers about the mental and emotional toll its services could take on kids.
