>I'm just finishing up a concept test for IGY with about 100 parents of 9-12 year olds (I added it to youth account creation study to get a read on impressions). A few things to above points: (a) parents typically think the age for IGY starts where we expected - 10. However (b) they think it would extend way beyond where we are cutting it off (most common response is 16). (c) For the transition, not one person said the child alone should decide at 13 to continue parent supervision elements (which is what privacy is saying we need to do). About 3/4s say they the parent(s) should decide alone and 1/4 say it should be a mutual parent-child decision, and (d) About 1/3 of the kids - particularly 11-12 - are already on Instagram in some fashion such as own account or shared account with parents. I did include them in the study as well to gauge interest/perceptions. About three-fourths of those parents want in some way to get their child an IGY account instead, either by creating an entirely new account or converting what they have to IGY, which is good news but a use case we haven't really discussed. We obviously have to take child's perspective also in consideration, but across studies, it's clear that parents want some supervision into midteens and don't just stop parenting at 13. The level of controls may change (such as from parent approving everything to more being just notified of certain things), but our cold turkey approach of 13 and you are done and child having complete control then goes directly against what parents are asking for.

>I'll prioritize getting this report done as well as the youth account work.

>They also expect the default to be closed for this age group (i.e., they approve things like contacts, etc.), but I can break this down by specific age and current IGY user or not.
