>Hey! Quick heads up--I mentioned this to Kathryn the other day and she asked if I'd let you know. I've been talking with Anya Drabkin, who's in charge of asking about emotion in research. She shared with me draft guidelines and a list of emotions we're encouraged not to ask about. There were as many positive/supportive adjectives as negative ones on the list, and it did make me think that it might hinder our ability to measure progress there. Anyway, hopefully it's nothing but wanted to flag in case you wanted to dig into it sooner than later.

>(In the last version of BEEF, I had a question about emotions experienced and how intense it was, and had to delete the data associated with both because this team said I shouldn't have asked those questions)

>Thanks for flagging! I saw this awhile ago and was awaiting for them to make more progress on this.

Dr. Diego Emiliano Castaneda (12/08/2021 13:38:40 PST):
>I heard about that.
